The Standard & Poor's 500 Index (the "S&P 500"), the Dow, the Russell 2000 Index, and other indexes, if applicable, are mentioned for comparative purposes only because they represent, respectively, indexes typically used to gauge the general performance of the U.S. securities markets or the small-cap segment of the U.S. equity universe. The use of these indices is not meant to be indicative of the asset composition or volatility of the portfolio of securities held by our clients, which may or may not have included securities which comprise the S&P 500, Dow and the Russell 2000 Index or other indexes, and which may hold considerably fewer than the number of different securities that make up Indexes. As such, clients' investment portfolios should be considered riskier than an investment in an index.
